London Street Singers.

From the London Globe. The London public has generously decided to dignify the noisier type of professional mendicant by the title of "singer," and still more generously has decided to put up with their recitations and even to pay them moneys for delivering them. We are glad to see that this is not the case in Glasgow. The inhabitants of that city have just risen in protest against an individual Aged Indian Chief Who Would Speak who gave out the following stanza: "The scene it was a peaceful one, The children at play. The larks above with songs of love, Joined in the harmony. The foul assassin then appeared, And stopped the joy-ous fun, And in another moment He his hellish work was done."

The lines, we believe, were topical, and referred to a tragedy that had taken place in the town. Twenty-one days' imprisonment was what the singer received, and no-body can say that it was too much. We have quoted the song in full as an instance of how the street singer turns naturally to gloom. A rollicking comic song would be less painful, but the street musician rarely rollicks. What he likes is a slow, mournful ballad, with plenty of breathing space in between the lines, so that he can stop and look around for coppers-in both senses of the word. A drunken man, singing the latest song with real gusto, is gathered in by the police before the end of the second bar. A professional beggar is allowed to massacre any hymn he pleases, choosing his own time.

in point of population does not occupy as important a position in the United States as Odessa does in Russia, but geographically and in the importance of their shipping interests they are very similar. Commercially Odessa is to Russia what New York is to the United States; and while there is no comparison between the two cities in point of size, population or the magnitude of commerce, still one can readily imagine what a battleship like the Ohio could do if, unmolested, she should come inside the Hook and shell New York.

Fourth City of the Empire. Odessa is the most important city and seaport in southern Russia and the fourth city of the empire in population. It is situated in the government of Kherson, on an elevation sloping toward an inlet of the Black sea. It lies about thirty-two miles northeast of the mouth of the Dniester and 938 miles by rail southwest of Moscow.

of Odessa are rather European than Russian. The city was built during the ninethe youngest among the large cities of Russia. It is regularly laid out around the bay, and has a number of fine streets and squares, from which magnificent views of the sea are obtained. The most popular boulevard is the Nikolayevsky boulevard, from which a grand stairway leads to the

There are many fine buildings, both ecclesiastical and secular. The chief among them are the cathedral, the stock exchange, the theater, the governor's palace, the city hall, the municipal library, containing 80,000 volumes, and the university building. Monuments to Alexander II, Cathe-rine II and Pushkin adorn various sections of the town. Many Religious Edifices.

There are about twenty-five orthodox hurches, a number of monasteries and synagogues and a few reformed churches, In the southern and eastern parts of the city are situated a number of parks, among which the chief are the Alexandrovsk Park and the botanical garden.

While Odessa is primarily a commercial place, it is also of considerable industrial importance. In 1899 it had over 500 large industrial establishments, employing about 21,000 persons, and with the output of over $30,000,000 a year. The chief establishments are flour mills, sugar refinerles, match factories, breweries, canneries and fron works.

The population increased with remarkable rapidity during the last century. The first settlers were mostly Greeks, Italians and Albanians, and in 1802 numbered 9,000. In 1901 the population was 450,000, of whom nearly two-thirds were Jews. The foreign population is now about 3,000.

Odessa takes its name from the Greek settlement Odessa, which existed there in Turks constructed on the present site the fortress of Khadji-Bey, which was taken by the Russians in 1789. In 1793 the place was fortified by the Russians, and a year later received its present name. The growth | that the "Thieves' Market" stands on the of the town was fostered by Paul I and by the Duc de Richelieu. In 1817 it was declared a free port, and this decree, remaining in force until 1859, made possible Odessa's commercial supremacy in southern Rus.

There are about 40,000 troops of all arms at Odessa, but there are no fortifications in which they could stand a siege if the rioters and mutineers got the upper hand.

The Russians of Odessa comprise scarcely one-third of the inhabitants of the city, about 150,000 of the residents being Jews and the remainder Greeks, Armenians, Turks and people of various European nationalities. In general the members of the lower classes of Odessa are persons of the most desperate character. Libau Important Naval Base.

Libau is Russia's most important naval base on the Baltic sea. It is fortified and has a large naval arsenal. Recently the last few warships of the Russian Baltic fleet have been fitting out at Libau ostensibly for a cruise to the far east. All the Russian fleet which went to the far east made Libau their last Russian port of call. Since the war with Japan began there have been reports of disaffection among the sailors at Libau and of many minor risings among them.

Libau is far to the north, on the Baltic sea. It is a small city of not more than 90,000 inhabitants, but nevertheless is an important port and easily competes with the northern ports of Russia. The principal exports are grain, seed and timber. The small water front has many spacious warehouses. There are no American residents of Libau.

marked an epoch in American history which is closed for good. There are at present perhaps 20,000 full-blood Indians in Indian Territory and some 12,000 in Oklahoma. These red men still possess a pride of race such as is not understandable by white They have watched the advance of men. They have watched the advance civilization, but have refused to join in it. They have felt that they were the last of the people who were robbed of an inher-itance of a whole continent, and that every instinct of self-preservation demanded that they should strive to the last to maintain not only their independence, but even their integrity and existence as a division of the human race.

This was a natural and most laudable feeling and purpose, but one pitiably useless and hopeless. The red man's career was ended when the Pilgrims landed at Ply-mouth Rock. The efforts of the native tribes to preserve themselves and their ownership of the continent has resulted almost in complete obliteration.

The last act of the drama is now being played in Indian Territory. The Indian is doomed to utter extinction as a race, and the present generation seems finally to have realized this inevitable fact. VESUVIUS OF AMERICA.

Great Mountain of Pure Sulphur Will From the Scientific American.

Every traveler through Old Mexico

hears of one spot which is more attrac tive to tourists from abroad than any other. This is the volcano of Popocatepetl. Some have called it the "Vesuvius of America," owing to the frequent eruptions which have marked its history, but unlike Vesuvius, its crater has been entered by man, and, remarkable as it may seem, here has been for centuries the site of a great natural industry. Popocatepeti has been producing sulphur probably for ages, according to the opinion of geologists and other experts who have examined the in-terior of the crater as far as it has been possible to venture with safety. True, it is by no means an extinct volcano. By day clouds of steam and smoke arise from the summit of the mountain, and at times in the night the sky above is illuminated by the night the sky above is illuminated by the glow from the fiery mass whose existence is revealed through the occasional vent here and there in the temporary bottom of the crater. It is a strange sight to witness human beings toiling in this abyss day after day, extracting the sulphur ore, as it is called, with pick and shovel, and packing it on their backs to the edge of the crater, where it is hoisted to the top. Some of the peons have labored in these depths 550 feet beneath the earth's surface for the greater part of their lives, since sulphur mining, as it of their lives, since sulphur mining, as it is called, has been carried on in the bowels of Popocatepeti for four centuries; yet no one knows when an eruption may occur which would destroy every living thing for miles around. From where they toll the workmen can clearly discern the fissures whence the escaping sulphur fumes and smoke prove that beneath them there is a furnace of nature; but were it not for the crevices the accum-ulation of the sulphur deport would cease. for they form a portion of the great nat-ural laboratory in which this material is compounded. The history of Mexico proves the age of this industry, for Cortez obtained sulphur, probably from the summit of the volcano, to use in manufacturing gunpowder for his soldiers. Since that time the substance has been obtained by the natives when the volcano was not in such a state of activity as to keep them from approaching it. For several years recently a considerable quantity has been secured, although by a very crude method. As already stated, the beds are worked by hand, the sulphur being placed in bags containing twenty-five pounds each. They are placed on the backs of human packers, who carry them to the foot of the crater and attach them to a rope suspended from the top. Then each is hoisted singly by means of a windlass. At the top the bags are given to other people, who seat themselves on straw mats and slide over the snow which covers the outer portion of the mountain to the timber line. At this point the sulphur is placed on mules to be transported to the railway station about nine miles distant. Various estimates have been made of the quantity of sulphur which at present exists in the crater, some figures placing it at fully 100,000,000 tons. Von Humboldt, who made an exhaustive study of the interior of the volcano, gave the opinion that the bed is the largest in the world. A commission of experts appointed by the Mexican government, however, made a careful study of the crater and confirm the statements that the quantity of sulphur is undoubtedly enormous. These reports have led to such an interest being taken in Popocatenetl that it has actually become American property and the flag of the United States is probably ere this floating above its summit, for a company of capitalists from the states has actually purchased this great factory of nature and intends mining the sulphur on an extensive scale.

MEXICAN THIEVES' MARKET. Place Where Goods Stolen From Murdered Man Were for Sale.

From the Mexican Herald. Tradition has it-and most happily for romance in this fascinating land traditions in most cases are still as good coin as factgrounds of what was once a part of the spacious gardens of the "new house" of Montezuma. In the days long gone by this garden of spacious proportions was the scene of many dark and dismal crimes, and many were the robberies and acts of violence that occurred there, for it was on a nighway much used and when night had fallen was very dark and dangerous.

The tale goes of the murder by a power-ful officer of the sweetheart of one of his retainers, a crime that rankled in the breast of the poor Indian until, not long afterward, he took his revenge, and his master lay dead, killed in a drunken stupor by the wronged servant. The wronged man, rifling the master's pockets, carried away with him from the house all the trinkets and valuables on which he could lay his hands. Then he hied himself to the protecting shade of Montezuma's gardens, where he hid himself under the trees until the coming day should waken the city and he could pass beyond the guard without molestation. But when he had been hidden only a short time, the alarm having spread, a servant, more zealous to his own interprevious squadrons and divisions of the ests than to avenge his master's murder third murderer made away with the goods, this time to keep them safe and secure until the excitement had blown over.

Then, on the very spot which he had stained with the blood of his fellow-servant, the wretch set up a tiny stand with the twice-stolen goods as the basis of his little stock, which he sold to the tourists of that days as they passed by the stand in their day as they passed by the stand in their visits to the famous gardens. From this rather thrilling beginning grew a classic market, until today there is the

A FISH LIKE A CAPITAL Y. The Life History of a Tiny Two-Headed Lake Trout.

From the New York Sun. Among the little fishes hatched out from a lot of lake trout eggs in the hatchery at the Aquarium, there was one with two heads joined to one tail. It was in form like a capital letter Y, with a head at the end of each arm. This was not a very unusual thing, for among the fishes born in any hatchery there is likely to be a limited number of freak fishes-fishes with two heads and one tail, or with two heads and two tails, or per-Kansas City a full-blood American should haps with one head and two tails. But this particular little lake trout turned out to unable to speak or understand the English be quite unusual in two respects, namely, language. But, nevertheless, such was the in the duration of its life and in the manner

> Commonly these little freak fishes do not live much beyond the time required for the fish derives its sustenance until it is able to feed in the ordinary way. This little freak lived for much longer than that pe-riod, and one head long survived the other. arms, and so they continued to grow until at the end of two months one head, which was at the left hand looking from the tail of the fish, died. But, living on instead of dying soon, and feeding, and continuing to grow, the living head, and that part of the body of the fish to which it was attached. grew out beyond the line of the lifeless head, and came practically to constitute the fish, with the lifeless head projecting now from its side, like the thick stub of the sawed-off branch of a tree projecting from the side of the trunk. The lifeless head was, at last, about a third of the length of the fish back from the head surviving. The total length of the fish when it died was about one and one-fourth inches.
